But, I just have a question to be answered. I have an idea and I would like to make it work for a relatively simple embedded device, like a couple of leds. I don't have an EE background, so bear with me. Basically, I would like to make an bootloader for the microcontroller, and maybe a very simple application which reads and writes to the memory. As I said, this is to have an idea and make something that hopefully can be done. As an example, I would like something that displays just a few lights. I don't know what the best language is to make this, I don't know what could be more simple, but for this kind of application (and as I said, very basic), what language could be used? Then, once the bootloader and the app have been made, how could I write them? If I have made a bootloader and an application for a simple MCU like the atmega1281, how should I know the address for the memory in which the application needs to write and read data? And as a last question, which programming language would be most appropriate? A: Embedded programming is actually pretty simple if
