To switch between 32-bit and 64-bit mode, use the File menu to click on Options and Preferences. In the General tab you will be able to select the Runtime options. Select the 32-bit option and this will give you the better results.

Technical Field The present invention pertains to methods and devices for attaching soft tissue to a soft tissue repair device. The surgical repair device is designed to be implanted between adjacent body tissue for the purpose of maintaining spacing between tissue structures. More particularly, the present invention pertains to methods and devices for attaching the soft tissue repair device to adjacent tissue. 2. Background Art Current procedures for soft tissue involving defects, for example, such as abdominal or back hernias, involve the surgical division of intervening tissue. In the case of hernias, this often involves a healing period that is months or even years. In other applications, soft tissue, for example, is simply opened or cut and allowed to naturally close or fuse. Later the wound edges are typically sutured together. It is becoming more clear that mesh implants can be fabricated from expanded polytetrafluoroethylene ("ePTFE"). It is known that tissue ingrowth into these implants can reduce the need for longer healing periods. Thus devices for attaching tissue to these implants can be used to reduce the opportunity for infection, to reduce the production of scar tissue, and to reduce the likelihood of relapse. Implantable prostheses and devices are known in the art. For example, reference is made to U.S. Pat. No. 5,102,417 for a Prosthetic Device for the Treatment of Ventral Hernia. In that patent, coiled springs are placed within a polyethylene mesh and during suturing the implant is held in place either by staples, wires, or surgical tape. The present invention avoids the use of surgical tape and staples and uses a retainer that is simply pressed against the implant with enough pressure to hold the implant in place ePTFE material. Similarly, reference also is made to U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,626,587 and 5,665,117 for Meniscus Repair. In the '587 patent, a mesh sheet is provided with retainer strips for attachment of the mesh to a meniscus.
