Many thanks for sharing. I was bummed that no new version has been released in a while. Mine i5 is running 5.2.1 with 8gb of ram right now and I've been fine with that. I switch between PS and LR all day long and haven't run into any performance issues. I did make some memory adjustments on my computer and maxed out the amount of RAM available for my main Photoshop application to 5.22 GB. That may or may not have been necessary, but I decide to do it anyhow. It took LR a few seconds longer to open some of the first clickable elements after the size increase but other than that, I haven't experienced any outside internet grumblings or frustrations. I am glad to hear that LR is stable as well. I was wondering if you could share the size of the PSD's that you open? I've been using the same PSD for years now and I enjoy the workflow once I changed it to LR5.0 and can't undo that change. Just curious what the largest PSD you're working was. Thanks for the feedback. When you say large, are you perhaps talking about the doc size? I actually think that larger sizes are the reason for the lag times experienced in your instance as larger doc sizes generally mean that several things have to happen simultaneously. Mind you, I don't know how many additional things are being loaded as part of the open call (i.e. whether they truly open simultaneously). With that being the case, there is still room for improvement to reduce the load time of the PSDoc. You can start by "binding" your assets ("bagging" things up to give them a shared memory address). You can also use the LR File Open As Standard PSD Template option to locate and open your PSDs on your system. Both should have positive impacts on performance (assuming that your storage and system is optimized), although as I stress near the end of my review you probably do need to make some memory adjustments to ensure the best performance.

It's a great time to be a designer. Like persuading people to buy shiny new gadgets, convincing them to invest in new technologies has been one of the holy grails of marketing over the last few years. It remains a popularity contest, as strong brands move customer attention away from mere text, computer programs and websites to more luxurious products such as phones, cars, houses, coffees, clothes and the like. Design - or is it design? - is now embedded in the core of most mainstream products. Fashions change; trends come and go; the ever-changing nature of the Internet means that brands need to be on point and keep pace with change. And the world is crying out for better, faster ways to create. The tools that enable designers to work more quickly, collaboratively and flexibly are a combined boon for brand communications. And now we have them. This year's event will focus on how digital media is used to communicate, inspire, entertain and sell. Hundreds of the world's leading creativity and design leaders, including Adobe Chief Creative Officer Ravi Das, will deliver keynotes and panel discussions on the latest trends in design, video, and the media delivering and monetizing digital product campaigns. The keynotes will include new insights from agencies such as 163®and research firms such as Nielsen. The full program agenda is available here: EVENTS.ADOBE.com.
