They are reliable, attentive, and don't mind digging through complex problems to reach root causes. They are happy to give advice about either Adobe tool usage or the task. These are people who have purchased this creator from retail or a cloud-based subscription service. They usually won't engage product to the degree of an editor, but will be someone who has an appropriate dialogue with the app, offerings, and business model. When we review Adobe software, the mass market are our baseline. They're savvy enough to understand their way around PDFs and digital effects, but note when they encounter a new use or another kind of creative process. Over time we see these people have a reflexive sense of whether or not an offer or tool is a good idea. These are our consumers, our population of visitors, and are crucial to review quality. These are active users of the product, usually contributors to the Photoshop community forums and/or authors of tool videos. Their comments are often useful for revealing advanced methods, a previous thought process, or to report bugs or glitches. Unlike editors, they aren't always looking to sell something, although they may have opinions about business decisions. For example, they tend to be critical when they perceive a product to be, well, a mediocre version of a competing offering.
